

Path to the highline...

I randomly chose a path that lead to Highline Park and in my journey there got lost which was pretty funny, but as I was walking I noticed how busy new york is and the many ways you can get somewhere and thats what I choose to document in my path to the highline.

The green cabs were something that caught my attention even though most of the taxi cabs in New York City are yellow the green cabs carry a very important duty and that is to move people only from borough to borough which I find essential since most of the people that work in manhattan commute.

City Bike was a program that began in 2013 that gave new yorkers and tourists another way of transportation today it has hunders of thousands of bikes. I saw more than a few stations of city bikes in my way to the highline, in my opinion it is both a fun and pollution free way to explore new york.

Thousand of new yorkers walk everyday so as I was walking around a question popped into my mind, are the sidewalks more crowded than the streets? according to statistics more tha 376,430 new yorkers walk to work everyday.

As I was walking by this station it occurred to me how at the beginning when I got to New York I was terrified of getting into the subway alone, and now I take it everyday. It still amazes me how useful and practical it is it gets you everywhere so fast and contrary to what it may appear

When you think of a yellow taxi you automatically think about manhattan, about luxurious women going shopping in fifth avenue and hailing a cab to their great upper east side apartment, but in the few weeks i've been living in the city I have found that this is one of the most expensive and slow ways to move.

Finally made it to the high line after going back and forth one of the things that caught my eye is how new york fast moving city is full of art and beautify I design everywhere you look. (Diane Von Furstenberg Advertisement)
